Supply of Champagne on the Nippon Maru Threatens to Be Quickly Exhausted.

Notwithstanding the social tabu that has been set against Major Strong and Lady Hope, the enjoyment of their stay in Honolulu did not seem to be affected by it. They pleased themselves in their own peculiar and expensive way, unmindful of the remarks made about them, or the wondering glances cast. They concluded not to stay at the Moana after the Advertiser found them there, but at a late hour returned to the Nippon Maru. It is said that Manager Card, becoming aware of the character of his guests, followed the precedent established by Manager Wren of the California, in San Francisco.

When Lady Hope went in bathing during the afternoon of her stay here, she gave the stewardess in charge of the ladies department a small scare by the large number of jewels she entrusted to her possession. Doubtless there were never before so many rare and valuable gems placed in that lady's keeping as while the titled songstress took her ablution in the Pacific. She was extremely generous to the servants who attended to her wants and wishes, which were many, and when she left the hotel they were several dollars richer for her visit.

During the forenoon of yesterday the man and the woman rode about the city, making themselves conspicuous by the amount of jewelry they wore, and the extremely odd, though fashionable and tasteful, cut of their clothes. While on the boat, watching the crowd that had gathered to witness the departure of the steamer, the contralto songstress gave a little exhibition of her temper, and told her "darling," as she caressingly called him most of the time, he was a "fool." Her little tantrum lasted only for a moment, however, and like a Hawaiian midsummer shower left everything lovelier and more beautiful than before. Much of the conversation between the two was carried on in French, but when her ladyship called the present object of her affections and the liquidator of her bills a "fool," she lapsed into vigorous Anglo-Saxon.

Several kodak fiends were on the pier, and the two dropped into consciously graceful poses for their benefit. Lady Hope even allowed several of her gentlemen acquaintances here to have their pictures taken standing beside her. Her graciousness was much appreciated. As the vessel pulled out and the swimming boys set up their cry of "Throw five cents," the hand that wears several priceless heirlooms of the house of Hope was the most prodigal in answering their entreaty. She did not confine herself to five-cent pieces, either.

Opinion here seems to be pretty well divided concerning them. Many seem to think the woman is a designing adventuress, and that she has succeeded in ensnaring a youth of 26 just for the pleasure it gives her. Others hold that the Major is old enough to know better. The most prevalent opinion is that they are both bad enough to make their going desirable.

The elopers are making great inroads on the steward's supply of high-priced liquors. The indications are that long before Kobe is reached there will be a champagne drought on the Maru.

ANECDOTES OF DR. MAXWELL

He Was Once Challenged by an Austrian to Fight a Duel.

Dr. Walter Maxwell, A.U., F.G.S. (London), F.N.G.S. (Washington), and Director Queensland Sugar Experiment Stations, was born in England, where he spent the earlier part of his life on his father's farms. He comes of the old proud race known as the Maxwell clan, distinguished for the part they played in the Border wars. It has been told us that when Rudyard Kipling and Dr. Maxwell were having an animated discussion regarding clan histories, Kipling said, "Don't be jealous, Maxwell, because I come from the Scotch. For sheep-stealing and downright cut-throat work, my ancestors were not to be compared with the Maxwells!"

After being privately educated in England, and spending several years in farming work, gaining experience in practical agriculture on his father's farms, young Maxwell was sent to the Continent, where he remained some years in scientific study. It was here he laid the foundation of those attainments that have since made him famous in the higher branches of science as applied to agriculture. We have learnt from one who knew the doctor during his sojourn at the German and Swiss universities, that he was always regarded as a very diligent student, but was never unmindful of the advantages attending athletic exercise. He was also fond of travel and was known in social concerns. It is said that he was challenged to a duel by an Austrian nobleman, known as an expert swordsman, the affair rising out of matters common among students. The doctor told the Austrian's "second" that the Anglo-Saxon code of honor did not demand duelling, but "in emergencies an Anglo-Saxon did 'accommodate' gentlemen," and intimated that he would meet the Austrian the next day to fight it out either with the fists or in the good old British style with pistols at ten paces. The Austrian declined.

Leaving the Continent of Europe, Dr. Maxwell went to America, where he spent five years, principally as an expert in agricultural matters to the United States Government. It was during that time that his name as an expert in sugar culture became known in all sugar-growing countries. From the United States he went to Honolulu, where he established the sugar experiment stations of the Hawaiian Islands, the results from which tending to further demonstrate his administrative ability and scientific powers. About eighteen months ago the doctor was commissioned by the Queensland Government to investigate and report on the sugar industry in that State. The report resulted in his being engaged by the Queensland Government to inaugurate similar work to that he had been engaged in regarding sugar cultivation in other countries.

Dr. Maxwell is the author of scientific publications in several languages. Certain of these works brought him notice from the learned societies of England and America. He is an agriculturist and a scientist, and believes in the concentration of one's powers. He has said that he owes much of his success, to close adherence to one object. Notwithstanding the position he has so far attained, he is yet a young man. Generally the doctor is somewhat reserved, but to those to whom he makes himself known he is very free and affable. An old college chum of the doctor's said, "The person that Maxwell takes to is all right; he is a true friend."—The Queenslander.

AULD BUILDING FOUR STORES

One Story Structure on Beretania Street Will be Erected Soon.

The Auld Estate will erect at the corner of Beretania and Emma streets a one-story block containing four stores, the front being on the first-named street. The demand for store rooms has been such that, since the announcement that the estate was considering the building of a block the rooms have been applied for several times over. Among the applicants for space are said to be grocers, plumbers and green grocers, so that the class of tenants justify the construction of the building.

The plans call for a plain frame building of one story in height. This will be divided into four stores, the frontage being slightly above 100 feet so that the stores will have each twenty-five feet in the clear. The building will be forty feet deep, clear, making in each store 1,000 square feet. These stores will be plainly fitted and finished, so that the total investment in the building will be less than $10,000. It was the intention at one time to make the building of two stories, but this has been abandoned as the offerings of tenants for the upper floor has not been up to that for the lower story. This change in the plans makes it possible to keep the investment low.

The projectors of the building have no fancy ideas as to the value of their premises, but will be satisfied with a fair return on the investment. George R. Carter, who has the building in charge, said that he had not absolutely fixed the rentals, but that they would be in the neighborhood of $50 a month for each of the storerooms. This is something more than 50 per cent less than is being asked for the same floor space in buildings recently erected in the downtown district.
